After several years in a well-paid job, Lena realised that earning more money was no longer enough to give her a sense of fulfilment. She had always enjoyed baking, but she wasn’t sure whether running a café was really her calling. Instead of making an impulsive decision, she spent a week shadowing a local business owner and asking about the challenges of running a café. That experience gave her a more realistic yardstick for judging her aspirations: she now knew what the work involved, rather than simply imagining a more exciting life.
